

Transdiagnostic Sleep Workshop in Secondary Care

Development of and Evaluating recruitment for a transdiagnostic Sleep Workshop

Aim

To assess:

- 1) the need for the workshop
- 2) the most appropriate content
- 3) The best method of recruitment
- 4) how effective, useful and viable this workshop is

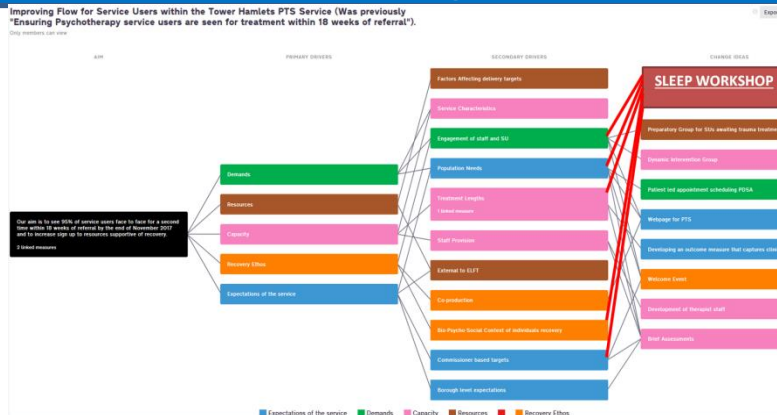

Why is this important to service users and carers?

- Sleep has been identified as a common issue within this secondary care psychological therapies service. The evidence base suggests sleep difficulties and mental health problems are frequently comorbid, with improvements in one shown to benefit the other.
- It is hoped that improving sleep will improve therapy outcomes and improve flow through the service as a result
- Service users provided insight into the need for a workshop and the content

Tests of Change

- We tested the best methods of referring patients (i.e. reminding clinicians in meetings, reminder emails and inviting patients via telephone and letter)
 - We tested the usefulness of the workshop
- Outcome data:
- Service user questionnaire feedback
 - Referral numbers and Attendance numbers
 - Insomnia Severity Index total score
 - Patient Feedback Questionnaire
 - Admin and Clinician Feedback Questionnaire on referral process

Learning and what next?

While a transdiagnostic sleep workshop can be valuable to those who attend, recruiting patients and managing DNAs needs to be evaluated further due to the poor referral and attendance rates. I will be developing a survey to send around both clinicians and admin staff to ask for their feedback on how the process could be more effective in future.

Summary

I developed a transdiagnostic Sleep Workshop for patients who have been assessed by Tower Hamlets Psychological Therapies Service and who are awaiting treatment. The workshop was aimed as a booster to improve treatment outcomes in subsequent therapy, and flow of the service as a result. The study tested and will review the best methods of clinicians identifying and referring patients to the workshop, as well as the best means of inviting patients to attend for more efficient group recruitment in the future.
